City Navigator.Computed tomography vs. magnetic resonance imaging to evaluate the spinal cord in children with intramedullary spinal cord tumors: A systematic review. Because of the presence of intervertebral discs, spine computed tomography (CT) has been used to assess the spinal cord in children with intramedullary spinal cord tumors (IMST). The purpose of this systematic review was to explore the accuracy of spinal cord cross-sectional area (SCA) measurements in children with IMST performed with CT vs. MR imaging. Eight different databases were systematically searched up to 28 December 2015. Studies including children with intramedullary spine tumors with CT and MR imaging evaluations were included. A two-by-two table was used for accuracy assessment. After double-blind screening, a quality assessment and data extraction were performed. The SCA was manually traced on axial slices. Data were analyzed using the STATA 13.1 software. A total of six studies with a total of 102 patients and 216 measurements met the inclusion criteria. The mean SCA was 0.75 ± 0.11 (range, 0.40-0.96)
